CBD, or Cannabidiol, is a non-psychoactive cannabinoid (does not produce a 'stoned' or 'high' sensation) which occurs in Cannabis Sativa (Hemp plant). CBD is the only cannabinoid with which various controlled and experimental studies and clinical trials have been conducted on humans.

Endocannabinoids

Like all mammals, the human body contains an endocannabinoid system. Endocannabinoids are the body's own cannabinoids: the body produces them itself (hence endo). They are essential to the healthy functioning of the body. Endocannabinoids control all important bodily processes. If this system is not well-balanced, or if there is a deficiency of cannabinoids in the body, all sorts of health problems may arise. The addition of cannabinoids to the body can therefore result in an improvement in health in all sorts of areas / a reduction in various (chronic) complaints. It is evident from research that if we introduce (intake) CBD into our endocannabinoid system, this does not create a dependence, but results in a healthier endocannabinoid system and body.

Phytocannabinoids

Hemp is the only plant with around 80 phytocannabinoids. These are plant-based cannabinoids, which are identical to our own endocannabinoids. THC (Tetrahydrocannabinol) and CBD (Cannabidiol) are the two most well-known cannabinoids that have recently attracted great attention in medical applications.

The difference between THC and CBD

THC is the most well-known and the most commonly encountered cannabinoid in cannabis; it stands for delta-9-tetrahydrocannabinol. This cannabinoid is responsible for the most significant psychoactive effect experienced following the consumption of cannabis. CBD is the second most common cannabinoid found in cannabis. It is made from the flowers and leaves of the hemp plant. This substance has many applications in the field of medicine and is the ingredient that is so sought after by medicinal users. In contrast to THC, CBD is not psychoactive, so it does not produce a 'stoned' or 'high' sensation, and is therefore safe to use.

The benefits of CBD

It is evident that CBD can contribute a great deal to healthy bodily functions and can have a positive effect on our health. It can be used both internally and externally. It has a strong anti-inflammatory effect and can also help prevent inflammation occurring in the body (preventive).
